DIOCESAN CONVENTION

At the beginning of February, the clergy and delegates of St. John's – the Senior Warden, Mr. David Barrow; Skip Jennings, Esquire; Mr. Neil Victor; Mrs. Morgan Murray; and Mrs. Paul Pressly – took part in Diocesan Convention in Augusta. It opened Thursday in historic St. Paul's with a lovely Evensong according to the Prayer Book of 1662, which served as the American Prayer Book until 1789, and which is now in its 350th year. There was no comment on the significance of the anniversary.

Friday to Saturday morning were devoted to business; and it was evident that Bishop Benhase, himself a leader of great practical ability, has surrounded himself with a very capable team, who have been energetically and effectively overhauling the financial and administrative apparatus of the diocese.

The convention's theme was "a new era of mission", and its focus the presentation to the Convention of plans for an ambitious (perhaps $25 million) "Campaign for Congregational Development." Designed to reverse a thirty-year trend of declining membership, this campaign is designed to fund three areas of mission: missionaries to youth and young adults at colleges and technical schools; the development of clergy and lay leadership in skills necessary for congregational growth; and planting new congregations.

The practical energy, imagination, and expertise being brought to bear on the revitalization of the Church's mission is impressive. It is a proper challenge to Episcopalians, who too often have ignored the Great Commission to "make disciples" (Matthew 28:19). There is much here from which to learn. Despite St. John's relative health, we cannot ignore the challenge to build the congregation, both in numbers and in faith. Purism alone will not build the church.

Impressive as this presentation was, however, I came away with reservations. What I missed was a clear theological vision of the ends, content, and means of the Church's mission. As one might properly expect, there were frequent references to "the gospel", "salvation", "making disciples", and so on. Yet precisely what these meant was not spelled out. At best, their meaning – and consensus about their meaning - was assumed.

The limitations of this approach became evident during the presentation on youth and young adult ministry, whose speakers testified to the importance of warm personal relationships and worldly good works without much in between. Whether intentional or not, there was nothing to distinguish their testimony from the moral relativism and doctrinal indifference of the gospel of “inclusivity”. Can mission so vaguely defined really be effective?

Speaking of “inclusivity”: there was a brief and informal discussion of a proposal to authorize a rite for same-sex blessings, likely to be presented at this summer's General Convention in Indianapolis. The discussion was somewhat inconclusive, since the details of the proposal are unknown at this time. Nor was there any presentation of the theological and ecclesial framework in which such a proposal might be considered. Those wishing to share their views on this subject were invited to write directly to the Bishop and Georgia's deputies to the General Convention at:

deputies@georgiaepiscopal.org.

Finally, Bishop Stacy Sauls, formerly of Tennessee and now Chief Operating Officer of the national church office, presented a proposal (which was adopted) to initiate the structural reform of General Convention, with a view to shifting monies from governance into program ("mission"). If this resolution does pass General Convention, major structural reform will be in the works. Just what form it will take remains to be seen.

The same reservation applies: to this as to the capital campaign: without the articulation of a clear theological vision, structural and practical efficiency alone is not enough. To be truly practical, practicality must be informed by a vision of the truth – and that vision cannot be taken for granted. GGD
